The terms and definitions contained in the relevant deed and scheme rules will always prevail over anything contained in this, or any other document. Any nomination of beneficiaries on this form is purely a non-binding expression of wishes on the part of the scheme Member and in no way inhibits the discretionary powers of the trustee. It should be remembered that in most countries, assets held in a pension trust do not form part of the member's estate on death and as such, the member does not deal with the allocation of the Pension Plan assets. Further, the deed and scheme rules will usually provide the trustee with a degree of discretion on the application of any value held in the member's account at the time of death of the member, typically between the member's family, financial dependents, the Member's personal estate or other nominate beneficiaries which is why it is important for Members to express their wishes at the time of establishing a pension plan and to periodically review and update those wishes should they change over time.
